Where an employee refuses to attend work due to fears about coronavirus, what action can an employer take and what pay are they entitled to?

If the employee can work from home, then this may well resolve the issue. If not, the employer would need to consider the current public health advice, the specific reason that the employee is concerned about attending work and whether it would be discriminatory to refuse home working, take disciplinary action, or withhold pay in light of the employee’s refusal.

If there is no discrimination, and the public health advice is such that the employee could reasonably be asked to continue to attend work then it is possible that the employee could be investigated for misconduct in terms of their refusal to follow a reasonable management instruction, and their unauthorised absence.

If the absence is unauthorised then the employee would likely not be entitled to pay as they are not willing to attend work. Check what payments do and do not count towards the minimum wage via Acas.org.uk.

Where an employee self-isolates following advice from a medical professional or government guidance, are they entitled to pay?

On the basis that the employee is not showing symptoms and has not been diagnosed with the disease, and that they cannot work from home during their self-isolation, but the individual self-isolates in response to either direction by a medical professional or government guidance they will be deemed incapable under the new deemed incapacity rules for SSP. They will therefore be entitled to SSP, or any contractual sick pay.

In what circumstances could holiday be used by workers to cover periods of absence?

The normal rules on taking annual leave under the Working Time Regulations 1998 will continue to apply. Workers may wish to take annual leave as an alternative to scenarios where they would otherwise be on SSP or nil pay. Workers are entitled to take statutory annual leave during sickness absence but may not be compelled by the employer to do so.

Workers who are not on sick leave can be instructed to take statutory annual leave by their employer, provided that they are given the required level of notice. An employer may give notice ordering a worker to take statutory holiday on specified dates. Such notice must be at least twice the length of the period of leave that the worker is being ordered to take. There are no explicit requirements about the form that this notice must take, but we advise that it is in writing.
What pay is an employee entitled to if they have mild respiratory symptoms but no diagnosis of Covid-19?

An employee in these circumstances may be treated as being on sick leave and be paid SSP or contractual sick pay. Even though their mild respiratory symptoms may not have resulted in them taking sickness absence, the fact that they have symptoms, it’s likely that this brings them within either the normal definition of incapacity, or the deemed incapacity provisions (if they fall within government guidance to self-isolate).

Where an employee is advised to self-isolate or quarantined under the Coronavirus Regulations, can they continue to work from home/the quarantine location?

This would depend upon the terms of the order under the Coronavirus Regulations. If they have the facility to work from the location to which they are quarantined, and they are well enough to do so, then this should be possible provided that the restriction imposed upon them under the Coronavirus Regulations does not explicitly or implicitly prevent them from working.

What should an employer do where an employee who is at work starts displaying symptoms?

If someone becomes unwell in the workplace with coronavirus symptoms, they should:
• Tell their employer immediately and go home
• Avoid touching anything
• Cough or sneeze into a tissue and put it in a bin, or if they do not have tissues, cough and sneeze into the crook of their elbow
• Use a separate bathroom from others, if possible

The unwell person must self-isolate at home for 14 days if they live with others, or 7 days if they live alone.

They can obtain advice or help by either:
• Using the NHS 111 coronavirus service website
• Calling 111, if they cannot access the NHS website
• Calling 999, if someone is seriously ill or life is at risk

It is advisable for the unwell person to use their own mobile phone or computer to access these services.

While the employee waits for advice from NHS 111 or an ambulance to arrive, they should remain at least two metres away from other people. They should avoid touching people, surfaces and objects and be advised to cover their mouth and nose with a disposable tissue when they cough or sneeze and put the tissue in a bag or pocket then throw the tissue in the bin. If they do not have any tissues available, they should cough and sneeze into the crook of their elbow.

If the employee needs to go to the bathroom while waiting for medical assistance, they should use a separate bathroom if available.

What action should employers be taking now?

The action an employer should be taking will depend upon the nature of the workplace, the roles carried out and the demographic of the workforce, but some of the issues that employers should consider from an employment law perspective include:

- The employer's approach to sick pay in the various scenarios. An employer should consider its contractual sick pay policy, and the practical implications on withholding pay or reducing pay to SSP. An employer will want to balance the costs of paying full pay where they are not legal obliged to do so with the indirect costs (in terms of spreading the virus and increasing sickness absence) where employees attend work following potential exposure to the virus, or even when exhibiting symptoms of it, in order to continue receiving pay. Some employers are introducing a new right to full pay for a finite period, in circumstances where the employees would otherwise be in receipt of nil pay or SSP.

- Consideration should be given to how absence management processes and trigger points may be adjusted to reflect self-isolation and high numbers of diagnosed cases.

- Whether the infrastructure is in place to allow large numbers of employees to work from home. Is the IT system prepared for a high number of employees to work remotely?

- Do employees have the hardware necessary to work from home?

- Will additional guidance need to be issued to reduce demand on the IT systems if many people will be working remotely simultaneously?

- Compliance with government, Public Health England and WHO guidance on hygiene in the workplace, and other preventative measures.

- Some employers are physically separating the workforce into separate units in an attempt to minimise the risk of COVID-19 spreading throughout the whole workforce.

- Consider appointing a coronavirus taskforce who are responsible for keeping track of developments, updating internal guidance and communicating with workers. Consider whether a dedicated intranet page is required.

- Clear communication with workers on the employer's policy on homeworking, work travel and precautionary isolation. Provide regular updates. Ensure that employees are asked to speak to their manager upon return from any overseas travel prior to attending the workplace, and that they are notified of the government's position on self-isolation as it develops, as well as the employer's position if more stringent.

- Ensure that employees have provided up to date personal details.

- Plan for mass closures of schools and nurseries. Identify business critical roles and how they can be maintained. Consider what pay employees will receive if they work part-time to fit around childcare, and the benefits of acting flexibly to allow as many employees as possible to continue working. Consider whether the business would be best served by encouraging employees to work flexibly and making that facility available, or by encouraging the use of statutory rights to time off to care for dependants, annual leave or parental leave.

- Provide clear information to managers on how to deal with an employee who attends work displaying symptoms, or who has potentially been exposed to the virus.

- Identify any high-risk employees and consider whether there are any potential discrimination implications which mean a more cautious approach is required.

- Critically consider whether any domestic and international work travel and events are necessary. Consider whether internal meetings can be carried out through virtual meetings.

- Where travel is necessary to high risk areas, consider what protective measures should be put in place and ensure that protective equipment is sourced and ordered.

- Identify the minimum safe level of workers required to continue operating, and how that can be maintained in the worst-case scenario. Identify the point at which the business may need to cease operating temporarily and consider the employment law consequences.
If the workplace temporarily closes due to insufficient numbers of employees being able to attend work or the impact of government restrictions, what pay are employees entitled to?

This will depend upon a number of factors including the circumstances of the employees’ absence. We have also assumed that alternative to closure (such as finding temporary cover to fill the gaps in the workforce or introducing home-working) have not prevented the closure.

On the basis that the employer envisages that the closure will be temporary and that it intends to reopen once enough employees are able to attend and any government restrictions allow it to do so, those who are already being treated as unable to work due to either self-isolation or diagnosis with COVID-19 will remain on sick leave until they are fit to return to work. At that point, they will be treated the same as the employees who were sent home at the point of closure. Appropriate communication should take place to ensure that they are aware of their position, and any transition from sick leave to another form of leave or lay-off.

Any temporary closure of the business will be treated as the employer’s decision and so, in principle, the employees will remain entitled to full pay, unless there is no contractual requirement to offer work (which may be the case for casual employees). This is on the basis that those who are not on sick leave are willing and able to work, and it is their employer’s decision to temporarily close the workplace which is preventing them from performing duties.

For most employers, this will present significant economic hardship: if the business if forced to close and cut off revenue, but also required to continue paying employees then it is easy to see how this could potentially lead to permanent closures, insolvency and redundancies.

The government has announced a number of measures to help businesses survive the economic hardship caused by the pandemic. However, it is likely that many will need to take action to reduce the payroll on a temporary basis. Some of the options include:

- Consulting with employees and trade unions or other representative bodies and try to agree a temporary reduction in pay and benefits for the duration of the crisis. Under normal circumstances, employees and their representatives would be unlikely to agree to such measures. However, where the alternative is closure and job losses, there may be more of an appetite to reach an agreement.
- Considering lay-off, if the employer has the contractual right to take that approach. If the employer does not have the contractual right to lay-off then it may either take the risk in doing so in breach of contract, or try to obtain consent to do so.
- Give notice to workers to take holiday. Employers are entitled to give notice to workers to take statutory annual leave, provided there is no contrary contractual right. Although this would not save the employer money in the short term, it would ensure a full workforce once the business reopens and allow full focus on rebuilding the business.
- Seek volunteers to take unpaid leave.
- Seek volunteers for voluntary redundancy.
- Consider whether there are workers and contractors whose contracts can be terminated without the risk of an unfair dismissal or redundancy payment claim.

If the longer-term impact of the pandemic is likely to mean that a reduced headcount will be required even when the business reopens then an employer may need to consider redundancies.
In what circumstances should the employer consider lay-off and short-time working?

Laying off employees means that the employer provides employees with no work (and no pay) for a period while retaining them as employees; short-time working means providing employees with less work (and less pay) for a period while retaining them as employees.

These are temporary solutions to the problem of no or less work. However, if employees are laid-off or put on short-time working in circumstances where the employer does not have the contractual right to do so then the employer will be in fundamental breach of contract entitling the employee to resign and claim constructive dismissal. Lay-off may need to be considered in the following scenarios:

- A downturn in work due to the effect of COVID-19 on suppliers and customers means that fewer employees are required on a temporary basis.
- Temporary closure of the workplace due to insufficient employees being able to work.

Short-time working may need to be considered where there is:

- A downturn in work due to the effect of COVID-19 on suppliers and customers meaning that the business does not need all employees to work their contracted hours.

Employees who are already unable to work, for example due to sickness or (arguably) medically advised self-isolation, cannot be laid-off.

What help is offered by the government for struggling employers?

In the Spring 2020 Budget, the government announced several measures to help employers who are struggling with the economic consequences of COVID-19. These include business rates reliefs, a Coronavirus Business Interruption Loan Scheme, a grant scheme for small businesses, and a dedicated helpline for those who need a deferral period on their tax liabilities.
